

PEER PRESSURE

Peer influence is almost undetectable, yet it enormously impacts people's behaviors. This psychological phenomenon happens to anyone who belongs to a certain group, especially young people who are just beginning to develop their personality. For example, if most of the students in a class own an iPad, the remaining students would also want an iPad to avoid feeling 'inferior' to their classmates. Some people may argue that people are driven by peer pressure in almost every situation. If we are better able to understand peer pressure, we may make rational use of this inside motivation. To specify, peer pressure could serve as an effective tool of leadership. Instead of delegating tasks directly, it is advisable to create a comparable and competing atmosphere in order to inspire innovation in people. As a result, the whole team tends to work with higher efficiency and team members are more likely to feel rewarded accordingly.
