

ADVICE FROM PARENTS

Parents always seem to be there to offer guidance and advice for their children. However, their advice is not always right. Worse, sometimes they can deliver misleading or outdated suggestions. Many children like to complain about their pushy parents who are eager to control every aspect of their life, from clothing to relationships with others. Because of parents who nag their children and issue endless warnings, many children now prefer to ask for help online. It is an undeniable fact that the internet offers them far more information than the older generation possibly could. However, when it comes to the problems like how to deal with people in relationships, parents' advice usually works. Their experiences would provide their children with more practical solutions for dealing with a social crisis than anything their children would find online. As a result, it becomes crucial for the younger generation to learn to distinguish between useful opinions and meaningless chatting from their caring parents.
