

PANDA CONSERVATION IN CHINA

The Giant Panda Protection and Research Center of China was established in the early 1990s to help keep giant pandas in existence. The Center, in collaboration with the central government and many world's leading wildlife conservation organizations, has spared no efforts in expanding panda reserves, improving panda breeding management and conducting extensive scientific research on the reintroduction of captive-bred giant pandas to their natural habitat. Simultaneously, strict laws against panda poaching and fur smuggling have been stipulated. The public is now equipped with the knowledge disseminated by the center and is increasingly aware of the importance of animal protection. All these measures are so effective that the panda population has increased to 170 in China. This accounts for 60% of the total number of the captive-bred giant pandas worldwide.
